After having fired the first two arrows of monetary easing and fiscal policy reform, “Abenomics” is at the crossroads. The true indicator of success or failure will hinge on the outcome of Shinzo Abe’s third arrow - delivering sustainable change to the corporate structures of Japan.

Milestones on the path to sustainable structural reform are improving corporate governance, increasing Japanese firms’ profitability and delivering a more diversified as well as internationally-minded work culture. All those aspects are poised to have a direct impact on Japan as a target for investors as well as Tokyo’s positioning as the self-proclaimed financial hub of Asia. From the viewpoint of the financial securities industry with the stock exchange at its core, Peter Babucke will elaborate on the main aspects of Abenomics’ third arrow and its future opportunities and threads.

Peter Babucke is a Vice President with the New Listings Department at the Tokyo Stock Exchange (“TSE”). After initially having worked for Lufthansa German Airlines, he moved to Barclays Global Investors (now: Blackrock) and later to Deutsche Börse/Eurex. Since 2010, Babucke has been in charge of TSE’s international business development, first in the secondary markets including derivatives and cash market trading. Since 2013, he is in charge of the international business development of TSE’s primary market section. As one of the very few Non-Japanese employees, this position offers him an intimate insight into the Japanese financial market. Peter Babucke holds a bachelor’s degree in Japanese Studies and Economics from Tübingen University as well as a master’s degree in Economics from the University of Hong Kong.
